as you can see here, the driver comes with a set of pre-installed c/c++ windows applications. the device driver is loaded when the serial ports are initialized by the system. there are several ways to determine which of the following ports are serial ports. here are some useful functions you can use to get the information. the serial port is identified as a com port on the windows system by a number and a letter. i don't know if it is the same driver for both linux and windows. you can get information about the driver for the port you are using by issuing the command `cat /proc/tty/driver/usb_serial/` to print out the information in a simple format. the first line shows the port name, number and the driver number. the next line is the device class. next is the descriptor and then the driver status. the last line is the device status. you can get the device class and descriptor by using the function `serialdevicegetclassdescriptor()` and the device status by using the function `serialdevicegetstatus()`. as you can see here, the driver is listed as loaded when the port is initialized. if you try to use the port without first loading the driver for it, the port is not listed in the list of ports. you can get the port number by using the function `serialdevicegetindex()`. you can get the serial port name and number by using the function `serialdevicegetportname()` and `serialdevicegetportnumber()`. you can get the driver information by using the function `serialdevicegetdriverinfo()`.
