The new information also means that the application is more dependent on the machine and not the piece of graphics hardware that the application is running on. Consequently, hardware-specific options for tuning are now mostly being ignored. Instead, Photoshop is now being constructed to be "configurable to suit all needs" , meaning the tone-mapping algorithms have "one setting" that can be tweaked via the preferences, however tuning this is almost always hardware-specific. In the future, new GPUs and computational advances will provide more in-depth exploration of the algorithm to tune it to a user's hardware. The image above provides an example where changes to the tone-mapping algorithm are visible, specifically in the highlights of the image where there is a false color shift in the highlights. The difference between the tone-map in Photoshop CC and the new tone-map in Photoshop CS6 is subtle, and the difference is only noticeable when viewed back-to-back on a monitor. There is no visual difference in the final output of the images. When this image was originally created, we had no control over the output viewed on a monitor, so we were unable to adjust the toneset to account for this visual difference. We needed to have a rule for adjusting the appearance of the toneset on screen so that we didn't lose our ability to have that insider knowledge.
