Contrast sensitivity in optic neuritis. Contrast sensitivity was measured in 28 patients with optic neuritis (ON) and 28 control subjects. In the ON group, contrast sensitivity was significantly decreased at small spatial frequencies at all levels of spatial averaging, but there were no significant differences in contrast sensitivity between patients with acute and chronic ON. Normal contrast sensitivity was observed in only 11 of the 28 patients; 11 patients had significantly reduced contrast sensitivity and 36 had normal contrast sensitivity. The results suggest that different mechanisms underlie the contrasting pattern of low- and high-spatial-frequency contrast sensitivity after ON.
