Nuclear war is an imminent risk to the U.S. and its allies, even if leaders continue to eschew the Cold War nuclear threat rhetoric common to the 1950s, a leading arms control expert and former Senate staffer said Thursday. Speaking at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, former Democratic staffer Stephen Schlesinger said that leaders' statements about the "threat" of nuclear weapons are dangerous and have led to nuclear weapon modernization programs with profound implications for U.S. interests. Asked whether "never-use" nuclear weapons rhetoric is a mirage, Schlesinger said the world is very close to a nuclear war with China or Russia, or both. The former staffer is the author of the book, "Hidden in Plain View: Why the Nuclear Threat is Still with Us." "That's the danger that we face: the ongoing drumbeat of nuclear threats," he said. Military officers and their political enablers routinely speak about the "threat" of nuclear weapons in a way that is "very similar to the 1950s," Schlesinger said. This rhetoric is meant to scare Congress and the American public into passing ever-expanding weapons spending programs, he said. "A loud whisper is the only argument for nuclear weapons modernization," Schlesinger said. However, the "weapon of mass destruction" rhetoric is part of a long-standing effort to frighten publics into supporting new weapons programs. During the 1950s, the "threat" of Soviet nuclear weapons was at a "crisis point," the former staffer said. "We have to understand that this rhetoric is an integral part of the discourse of nuclear weapons programs," Schlesinger said. "The ultimate outcome is not the abolition of nuclear weapons," Schlesinger said. "It's just that you eliminate all kinds of spending on them." "We are at the 2edc1e01e8
