PXR activation has also been shown to induce cholestasis by down-regulation of hepatic expression of multidrug resistance-3 (MDR3), an ATP-binding cassette transporter responsible for biliary secretion of phospholipids \[@A16864R14]\]. These studies suggest that the molecular mechanisms for bilirubin-induced cholestasis are different from alcohol-induced cholestasis, in which PXR activation has not been demonstrated. However, ethanol-induced oxidative stress and PXR activation may cause cholestasis by a common mechanism of damage. \[[@A16864R21], [@A16864R24]\] In accordance with our results, some studies have shown that bilirubin can enhance oxidative stress and toxicity caused by different agents \[[@A16864R25]-

[@A16864R28]\]. These studies suggested that cholestatic effects of xenobiotics may be dependent on the degree and duration of oxidative stress. We found that liver levels of gamma-GCS and G6PD were increased with CDCA-treatment, but not UDCA-treatment, whereas these levels were not different among the three different concentrations of CDCA-treatment groups. Considering that the microsomal monooxygenases play a major role in the CDCA-metabolism, these findings suggest that gamma-GCS and G6PD may not be major determinants of the cholestatic effect of CDCA. Bilirubin is a potent inducer of mitogen activated protein kinase kinase-1 (MEK-1), a negative regulator of ERK1/2 signaling \[[@A16864R29]\], and so inhibition of MEK-1 signaling may be associated with the cholestatic effect of CDCA. However, our results suggest that hep 79a2804d6b
